

Emma is Partner at AdBio, an European early stage venture capital firm in life sciences. She has more than 20 years of experience in the pharma and biotech industry in roles of business development, corporate strategy and portfolio management. She has an extensive track record of transactions from early development to commercial stage, including in-licensing, co-development, option rights and product acquisitions. She began her career after her PhD at Crystax, a young biotech company incubated in the Barcelona Science Park in structure-based drug discovery. After that, she moved to Gebro Pharma, a commercially driven Austrian pharma company where she led the Corporate and Business Development activities and also established an R&D unit. Attracted by breakthrough innovation she moved to Grifols as Innovation Scouting Director in the external innovation and corporate venture arm, establishing collaborations and equity investments in startups with strategic fit. At AdBio she is sharing her time between Paris and Barcelona, supporting early stage investments and company creation initiatives in the European ecosystem.